Title: Peace starts with a P^e: Parents' and Children's Perceptions of Peace. Abstract: My dissertation focused on data collected from children and parents in the United States and Yugoslavia shortly after the Yugoslavia-NATO conflict in the Spring of 1999. The focal of point of analysis was the parents' and children's answers to questions about peace. The qualitative analysis revealed a number of themes in the parents' and children's responses regarding peace. Major themes identified in the responses of Belgrade parents and children included defining peace in contrast to war and as normal life. In the responses of U.S. parents and children, peace was most often described in contrast to war and as the presence of prosocial behaviors. Parents' and children's answers were compared, and differences between the responses of participants in the U.S. and participants in Belgrade were investigated. The responses of boys and girls and of younger and older children also were compared. Cognitive developmental theory was used to explain the differences in meanings attributed to peace by older and younger children. Symbolic interactionism provided a framework for understanding the meanings attributed to peace as they differed by group and suggested that the political violence experienced by the parents and children in Belgrade was especially important in understanding the meanings they gave to peace.
